

Tourist allure in cities we have visited

Hastings

It is a fairly old town with great stories at different times that have changed England. It borders the English Channel, making it a coastal town. Its economy is centered on fishing, local food (Fish and chips) and tourism with different cultural places. The city center is historic with its half-timbered houses and old buildings, which for us gives it all its charm. The landscape is very contrasted with a seaside town and a cultural space far from the city, with the Battle

Museum of local history and the smugglers adventures. However this city remains rather deserted in spite of its potential and the museums remain simple.

Brighton

It is a city which, according to us, has everything to please. It looks nothing like English cities but rather a Californian city, due to its landscape (palm trees, the Pier, ...), the various activities possible to do (casino, ...) and architecture. It is also a coastal city, but nevertheless it does not use fishing as first income but rather the city is based on tourism and gambling. The Royal Pavilion is a good example :it is a beautiful castle with unusual architecture despite not taking a picture.

Londres

London, capital of England, is a great world metropolis. It is a rich city, modern but not only economically speaking, there is a lot of activities to do. It is a city very focused on tourism that each year welcomes a few million tourists. In addition, museums are free to visit such as the National Natural History Museum. The afternoon in London was very nice and the museum was rewarding.

However we all regret not having visited the entire city.
