

A French bus creates a fuss in a small English village

It happened in April the 9th at around 6pm in a small English village, the bus containing French people was heading to enter a non-authorized zone. It ended up starting a Narrow Street, blocking the entire traffic. Anger could be heard, as well as a lot of laughs coming from the students.

After half an hour of struggle, the bus finally found its way out thanks to the Citizens' help, who were helping the poor bus driver, driven crazy by some old folks who swore about complaining to the police, and was watching the whole incident while drinking, indeed, the cup of cream tea.

Even if the diplomatic incident was avoided, it is still commonly said that the Queen Elizabeth II was holding in her hands the remote of the nuclear weapon, ready to attack France whenever a citizen would be harmed. And unfortunately for here everyone was left unharmed at the exception of house overhang, which suffered several collisions since it was built.
